With the security of the modern . this context, while the ILC can only take part in negotiations after the EU countries have already agreed the terms. For the ILC, such an agreement would be a condition precedent to negotiations. In this context, it is vital that the EU understands that the ILC cannot negotiate on its own, but must be presented as a joint negotiating body of the EU states and Ukraine, as provided for in the ILC charter.

This will minimise the risks of intergovernmental disputes and put the final state of Ukraine on a much firmer foundation. In conclusion, the EU should not hesitate to support stronger institutions in order to secure our interests. The EU should build on its strengths, not its weaknesses. To achieve this, the EU has to play its full role as an institution that brings the benefits of a rules-based global economy to the EU and to the wider world. In doing so, it has to be crystal clear that it will not accept the revisionist attempts to undermine the EU's basic values, including its values that protect democratic principles in international institutions, including the ILC. More specifically, the EU should support and protect the independence of the ILC from the underlying institutional context of the Doha negotiations. The EU should fully exploit the opportunities it has to shape global governance through the G20, as envisaged in the recent High Level Panel. The EU should focus on building partnerships around the G20 and on becoming a leading voice in international negotiations. This is part of an integrated approach to conflict prevention and resolution. The EU should also bring much greater commitment to the principles of international law, in particular by upholding its core values. The EU should pay much greater attention to the results of international law-making in its own area of responsibility, particularly by ensuring the compliance of EU agreements with international treaties. It should take the lead in persuading third countries to do the same. It should also explain more clearly to the public and to non-EU countries why the fundamental values that hold the EU together are worth defending against attacks, and how they give value to the EU as an institution.
