Two different methods: Geochemistry (biochemistry, analytical chemistry and biophysical chemistry), and Biological activity (LifeCensus®). Both methods are constantly updated according to the latest research. In geochemistry we calculate the overall pollution of the sea. There are different methods to measure the toxic properties of the pollutants in the sea (see table). These chemicals are toxic for aquatic life. Also, the toxic substances are measured in terms of risk to the environment and aquatic life. Toxic substances are usually called pollutants or "contaminants". Geochemical data are not enough to establish cause-and-effect relationships. This kind of data is only the basis for scientific studies, but it is not enough for decision-making. Many other factors, such as wind, waves, water currents, temperatures, etc. can also affect the concentrations of toxic substances. Based on the geochemistry data of individual pollutants we can assess the overall toxicity of the water. Here the results of the different methods are compared and the most toxic pollutant is ranked. But this ranking only gives a general idea of the toxicity in the sea. If there is too much toxicity in the sea it is advisable to reconsider the type of marine fuel used for the power generation. LifeCensus® is a new method to determine the overall toxicity of the sea. The method is used to analyse the effect of toxic substances on the marine ecosystem. It analyses all aspects of life. The method uses the information obtained from the sea life on the toxicity of the pollutants. In order to compare the results of different methods it is necessary to standardise the "biological activity". LifeCensus® is a new method for assessing the overall toxicity of the sea based on the biological activity of different types of organisms. This method is based on the fact that all organisms have a reaction to the toxic substances and this reaction will show in their behaviour. Based on this the toxicity of the sea is calculated and a ranking is obtained. The LifeCensus® method is very new and based on the idea of the founder and his team. The original idea was to measure the biological effect of the toxic substances on the marine ecosystem. To measure the biological effect of the toxic substances, the team started with some of the most important organisms in the sea and tested them. The first LifeCensus® measurement project was done with the common herring. It is an important food source for the
