Are we really a superpower anymore? As the news world went nuts over the spectacle of the Trump administration threatening to slap tariffs on $150bn (£123bn) of Chinese imports and Beijing threatening trade war, I was determined not to let it distract me from talking about the vaunted “peaceful rise” of China and its “opening up” towards the West. As the latest survey of global perceptions of China suggests, the prevailing view in the West has stopped short of believing it has really become a great power. But at the same time, China has never quite received the “superpower” status it was widely promised, though the trajectory towards the status of top-tier nation is surely under way. The perceptions survey, by Pew Research Centre, showed that around the world there is a growing belief that China’s power has reached new heights, but there is a striking reluctance to believe that China truly has become a superpower. Whether it is a rise into a great power, or a return to greatness after a low point in early-1980s, the US has long seen China as a rising power to be reckoned with. To be sure, China’s growing economic power has become the main focus of many Western political and media discussions. But its military power has remained largely under the radar, with seemingly few people realising just how rapidly China has built up its own military might in the past two decades. The story of the region's "rebalancing", which took on political significance in December 2016 when US President-elect Donald Trump was warned about Chinese dominance by the generals and admirals on both sides of the Pacific, has been largely lost in the furor over Trump's crackdown on China's trade practices. Though it is impossible to predict China's future rise, or lack thereof, many people in the West would surely agree that its military might, despite some recent problems, is rising in tandem with its economic and
