July 30, 2005 Race for the Cure in the National Capital Overcoming my suspicion of anything related to Sally Ride, I decided to attend the on-line e-mail campaign supporting Susan G. Komen for the Cure. This was the first time I ever heard of Komen, so when I clicked on the link, I had absolutely no idea what it was. Needless to say, this was not the link I expected. Now don't get me wrong, I'm sure there are great, worthy causes out there, but based on the history of Komen and the continuing controversy, I wasn't even sure I wanted to be a part of it. Even though I am on the side of breast cancer research, I knew we'd be struggling to get funding for pretty much all of it. It's not like people don't already donate money to some of the more "discriminatory" causes out there. How much money can you raise in the name of breast cancer research? I know how much I can raise, and I'm happy to give it away, but I wanted to be supportive and not outspend the combined funds of the other side. The link I clicked on took me to this page (and this struck me as odd. I found it strange that they would have a separate home page for the DC chapter. Sure, I guess it makes sense for you to have a home page separate from the national one, but I was originally expecting another link to the national site for the other DC chapter. Does anyone else feel this way? Is there a reason for it? The big red link at the top of the page led to this page (This link had a really awesome thing on it. I had to click on it, so that I could click on the link underneath it. Why, you ask? Because the link wasn't working on my computer. Once again, I clicked on the red link at the top of the page, and was led to this site (I really like the layout of this site. It's clean and organized, and takes me right to the article I want to read. I started clicking around a little and then I happened upon the first link. It was the link for Komen's Investment Committee. I clicked on it
