When the .A few weeks ago, a prominent African-American pastor and preacher fell ill, and in the past week he has unfortunately died. Few would have expected to see Rev. Charles M. Daniels die while others continue to live. If you visit his Facebook page, you can see that he has been posting photos of his trips to the gym, church services, his home, restaurant, and even a trip to America with his wife. This often leads you to believe that he is just like any other American. However, when one reads his posts one can see the brutality that he endured as a boy. According to his Facebook page, he was beaten by his uncle over the course of years. He was also sexually abused by his mother's boyfriend. Although he is an American pastor, he has a unique story to tell. At 37 years old, he retired from a career that he had been working with for the last 26 years. He wanted to use this time to tell his story. His story began when he was 19 years old. His mother was pregnant with her fifth child, and like many children in the black community, he was left with the job of taking care of his siblings. During his childhood, his uncle decided to play a game with him. He decided to molest him. Not only did his uncle act inappropriately, but he also beat him for telling people what he had done. How did Daniels survive? At an early age, he learned how to defend himself, and he knew that in order to live, he needed to start fighting back. He began to learn how to protect himself against other people's intentions, and then it all became a cycle that he would carry out into his adulthood. Many children in the community that he grew up in experienced situations that would leave them with no hope of surviving. This left them susceptible to other kinds of abuse and maltreatment. The only way that they would survive was to learn to fight. If you are a viewer of the Netflix show, Mind of a Child, then you'll remember the scene where has suggested that while an individual is exercising, the amount of glucose in their blood increases as a result of the release of the hormone, insulin. This means that during exercise, particularly in those using intensive calorie burning forms of exercise, glucose levels in the blood can increase by 300%. However, the amount of glucose in your bloodstream isn't the only thing that changes when you exercise, insulin levels do too. This has significant implications for diabetes treatment, as insulin is often prescribed to prevent glucose from accumulating in the blood. Insulin is also used to lower blood sugar when someone is hypoglycemic, but it's important to make sure that you don't use too much of it, or your blood glucose will become too low. How much insulin is too much? Insulin levels do have a set point where they should be at to prevent you from becoming hypoglycemic, but this point is rarely achieved, even with intensive insulin therapy. The result of this is that insulin levels are also often increasing during exercise, which has been known to cause an increase in hypoglycemia. The problem is that if someone is exercising and their insulin levels are high, it can cause someone to become hypoglycemic (low blood sugar).

The 'Hypo Clinic' In a recent piece of research published in the journal Diabetes Care, U of Minnesota researchers aimed to overcome this problem by setting up the first ever in-patient 'Hypo Clinic'. The clinic was specifically set up for this purpose, by educating people about diabetes management, and training people to test their blood glucose levels and inject insulin as needed. "Through the Hypo Clinic we found that insulin dosing was less than optimal, but also that the data on insulin usage could be potentially improved with education," says University of Minnesota Professor Andrew Jackson.

"We wanted to know if they are hypoglycemic, how many times have they experienced an episode of hypoglycemia, and whether hypoglycemia is improved by being at the Hypo Clinic." The study found that 14% of their patients with diabetes who were previously unaware of their hypoglycemic episodes experienced episodes of hypoglycemia, and a further 9% of people did not know that hypoglycemia is a potentially life-
