The proposed approach will provide a means for determining the extent to which women and the public are generally aware that breast cancer risk is a function of age and reproductive history. Establishing such awareness will require that women be routinely assessed for age at menopause and that an estimate of the number of premenopausal births be made. Equally important will be the development of a detailed epidemiological model to predict the subsequent probability of developing breast cancer for women of different ages and reproductive histories. It is expected that the use of these methods will be far more widespread among general practitioners than is currently the case. The analysis of existing data will be used to test whether the use of these methods by clinical practitioners has occurred at a rate that would be predicted by their use in a population of similar size. The second purpose of the proposal is to evaluate a new screening procedure that is a surrogate for the mammogram, i.e. the measurement of the breast ductal and lobular distribution of mammary secretion using a new Doppler ultrasound technique. 6d1f23a050
